CONTRIBUTORS

Natale Zappia is an associate professor and the Nadine Austin Wood Chair in American History at Whittier College. His work explores the intersection of food systems, Indigenous political economies, and ecological transformations across early North America. His recent book, Traders and Raiders: The Indigenous World of the Colorado Basin (UNC Press, 2014; paperback 2016), tells the early history of the Indigenous Lower Colorado River. Previously, Zappia served as the Executive Director of the Garden School Foundation, an environmental non-profit based in South Los Angeles focusing on ecological literacy. He continues his focus on food justice issues as co-director of Whittier College's Sustainable Urban Farm Lab and co-director of Whittier's Integrated Arts and Humanities Program.

Gary Liss has his B.A. degree in Geography with an emphasis in Cartography/GIS. He has deep roots in the Mulwood section of Calabasas, having grown up there through the 1960s/70s, and for many years has enjoyed a multitude of memorable hikes throughout the Santa Monica Mountains. For the last ten years, he has been helping the Malibu Creek Docents with their State Park trail map and, as a result, has acquired a growing interest in the Craggs Country Club and early settler history of Malibu Creek State Park and vicinity. Since the discovery of the largely forgotten and nearly lost photograph collection of Frank and Josephine Case, uncovering the story of Frank and Josephine Case and their granddaughter Jane Pier, this article was conceived and eventually turned into a reality with the help of Merry Ovnick and the Southern California Quarterly, Wendy Mullins, Linda Dowler, Ann Suhr, and Linda Ward-Skipworth.

David Neumann earned a PhD in History from the University of Southern California as a Provost's Fellow. His research focuses on twentieth-century American religion, particularly in Southern California. His book, Paramahansa Yogananda: Modern American Religion in a Global Age, will be published by the University of North Carolina Press in 2019. He has written articles for Religion and American Culture and The Journal of Religious History. An Assistant Professor of History Education at Cal Poly Pomona, his work emphasizes historical thinking, historical literacy, and the intersection of scholarship and pedagogy.
