CONTRIBUTORS

Karen S. Wilson currently is the Sady and Ludwig Kahn Research Fellow with the UCLA Center for Jewish Studies, working on “Mapping Jewish Los Angeles,” a multimedia digital history project. She is curator of “Jews in the Los Angeles Mosaic” at the Autry National Center (May 2013-January 2014). She received her Ph.D. in U.S. History from the University of California, Los Angeles. Her dissertation, entitled “On the Cosmopolitan Frontier: Jews, Social Networks, and Nineteenth-Century Los Angeles,” examines the ways in which diverse social networks shaped the emergent American city and the incorporation of Jewish settlers in post-Gold Rush society.

Paul Bryan Gray, a practicing attorney in everyday life, is a productive historian as well. His book A Clamor for Equality: Emergence and Exile of California Activist Francisco P. Ramírez was published in 2012 by Texas Tech University Press. His most recent article in the Southern California Quarterly, was “‘The Men Were Left Astonished’: Mexican Women in Las Juntas Patrióticas de Señoras, 1863–1866,” (vol. 94, no. 2; Summer 2012).

Cheryl L. Wilkinson is a May 2013 candidate for the Master’s degree in history at California State University, Northridge. Her article in this issue is an extension of her M.A. thesis, “Veterans in Our Midst: Disabled Union Veterans in West Los Angeles, 1888-1914.” Her undergraduate honors thesis at UCLA (2008), also on the Pacific Branch of the National Home for Disabled Veterans, won the Franklin D. Murphy Award for the best paper on the history of medicine written by an undergraduate.

Cover: The French public avidly sought news of the California gold rush and publishers and artists rushed to fill the demand, even if they had little solid information about the place or mining techniques. In this image, dainty French miners with bow ties exclaim over a large nugget uncovered just below the surface—surrounded by palm trees alien to the Sierras. *L.
